Conclusion [#Sec27] ===== Our study showed that in the selected medium-sized metropolitan cities of Australia, the prevalence of diabetes is projected to increase in 2015 and 2050. We also found that rapid urbanisation is significantly associated with increase in diabetes prevalence, possibly due to possible increase in lifestyle-related risk factors, including higher BMI, and lack of physical activity. The association is consistent across age, gender and place. The results of this study contribute to a better understanding of the role of urbanisation and associated risk factors in the rising diabetes burden. The frequency of data collection was important in the construction of the estimation model. We recognise that the use of extrapolation factors may introduce some uncertainty about the overall trends that may not be evident in the data used, such as those that arise from changes in policy or health care provision. The extrapolation approach used may be more appropriate than modelling the future burden, as there are differences in the demographics (age and gender), but the overall conceptual uncertainty is similar to that of a model based on future trends. For example, if diabetes prevalence continues to increase in years to come, then the model results may not be sensitive to extrapolation factors.
