The Germans say they are also concerned about what critics and adversaries will say about the move. They have a memory of last century's blame game over the massacre in Rwanda and say the United States, as a military superpower with a long memory, will remember that one. The Germans could also be using the "climate" of general fear. Like other European countries, they hope to ride the wave of anti-American sentiment produced by the Sept. 11 attacks. "I am concerned that the U.S. will say that Germany is backing this terrorism," Mr. Hammes said. "I know from my own experience that the U.S. has a long memory. If you do something, that can be used against you." The aim is to provide the president and the American people, particularly in the provinces, with a chance to see themselves as engaged and aware of the bigger picture. "The U.S. has a lot of questions about Iraq," Mr. Hammes said. "We want them to know that the Iraqis were not going to have a passive role in the process. They knew full well that the U.S. would come in and change the course of events." While the German officials all seem to be in agreement on the need to present an image of participation by the Iraqis and the United States, they differ on how aggressively to do it. In contrast to Britain and France, the Germans worry that the United States might preempt any formal participation in some negotiations when it chooses to appear before the Security Council this month — either the day of the vote or the day after. "The U.S. wants to use this as an opportunity to move," Mr. Hammes said. "But we want to be there to help them find the right formula" for how to manage the situation after the vote. Mr. Hammes said that, unlike the French, who saw themselves as the peacekeepers of the matter, the Germans do not want a military role in the stabilization process. "We want to have the Iraqis present an atmosphere of democracy in Iraq," he said. "That means that they will provide the training for the army and the police." It is important that people come to know and understand the Iraqis, he said. "The U.S. is turning back the Iraqis. They

Desperate commuters in Manchester will be handed a £2.50 discount off their first tube fare for March after a Transport for Greater Manchester (TfGM) Twitter poll held a virtual tie with Channel 4's I'm A Celebrity. The charity is planning its first community relations week of its summer tour with a social media campaign titled #MyManchesterMetro, which aims to name and shame poor customer service providers and encourage travellers to offer feedback to TfGM. The theme of the week is 'whatever it takes', with the organisation asking people to share Twitter posts with the #mymanchestermetro hashtag to offer their advice. So far the most popular post so far seems to be a review of the Fallowfield service by Twitter user @Luke9693867. He shared a photo of the fare information boards which had a £2.50 discount marked on them, making them £5. A TfGM spokesman said: "We held the poll to see what message was getting the most airplay in the public sphere. We are going to use the outcome to plan our actions for the rest of the year. "The poll was for the first week of March, but we're going to be using all the information from it. After the election and all the positive PR from our community weeks, we're keen to build on that." Along with the £2.50 discount, an accompanying TfGM survey on Twitter revealed that 36 per cent of commuters would pay an extra £2.50 for a free wifi service, and 55 per cent would pay up if they were offered a free breakfast. The TfGM survey was conducted with 1,004 adults throughout the Greater Manchester region, with 51 per cent suggesting free WiFi, 67 per cent free breakfast, and 66 per cent free biscuits or brownies. The results of the poll came shortly after TfGM launched its community relations week to coincide with its summer tour, which will see the organisation visit Manchester, Rochdale, Salford, Bury, Oldham, Ashton, St Helens, Bolton, Wigan and Liverpool. Rochdale resident Daniel Gallon was treated to a free hot breakfast last Saturday after raising more than £1,000 in support of the campaign. He said: "I was waiting in the queue to pay for my train fare and I heard some anti-
